The commutator and head end of the armature are entirely inclosed and protected by cast-iron covers which fit closely to the frame, protecting it from moisture and mechanical injury, and which may be readily removed for inspection. The wires leading to the commutator and field will be brought through the frame in water-tight gaskets. The peculiar construction of field, which is standard with this company, insures an equal energization of all of the poles, allows of the least possible weight of steel and the smallest size and weight of field energizing coils, all of which contribute to the highest efficiency. The armature is built up of laminated soft iron of the highest magnetic permeability, and is all tested before being used for low hysteresis and other loss. The armature is of slotted pattern...
