Hope never for a moment deserted me, and although I fully realized my financial condition, I set at once to work to devise a plan for mending my fortune, which had disappeared before my eyes. The Steamship Company disclaimed being responsible for my baggage, and informed me that all personal property was shipped at the owner s risk unless insured against accident before leaving port. My trunks contained not only my wardrobe, but letters of introduction, newspaper notices, steel plates, lithographs, and advertizing bills, as well as many other necessary accompaniments to my professional career which it was impossible to replace. Many a person less resolute, in my position, would have succumbed at the prospect before them and given up the fight. With me the exigencies of the case only instilled new courage into a nature that had become steeled to adversity; and in the many ordeals through which I had passed I found no such word as fail. In my chequered life the clouds were ever darkest before the dawn. I still had faith in the good fortune that had always resulted from my efforts, and following the impressions I knew would lead me right I determined at once to begin the battle. There were obstacles to overcome that threatened to block the way, but the business experience I had acquired with my American company came to my aid in this trying emergency. Without delay I negotiated for...
