Excerpt: . . . while doing this, Hector and Thyra made a charming picture. He was in his finest Highland costume; and Thyra in a white gown, brightened with beautiful coral ornaments her father had brought her from the Mediterranean. Then Paul said: Robert Thorson, it were ill indeed, to have a friendly meeting, and not have a few verses from The Lily. And the Dominie added: That is well said. It is the best of hymns. There are a hundred verses in it, Dominie. It is longer than a sermon, thou knows. But say for us only those few verses thou spoke on Petersons boat. Thou must remember; we were waiting for the nets to fill. Then Thyra who was sitting at Roberts right hand leaned toward him and said in a whisper: Speak to us, Robert; I would like it. And blushing with the pleasure of...
