Why the end Simply because I have filled the allotted space. It were easy to pursue the subject, to go on adding chapter to chapter, returning to the farewells and partings, describing other notable weddings, and extending the notice of an army of royal grandchildren to great-grandchildren. Much might still be said of courtly doings in more recent days, of royaltys domestic life, and records of great and grand State doings. I have said nothing of the progress of trade and commerce, of mechanical and scientific discoveries and their practical applications, of the glorious spread of our Colonial Empire, or of the last half-centurys British wars, with all their stirring achievements and heroic deeds. The political conquests of the period have been but slightly touched, and more remains to be told of the grand, alternately upward-running and down-flowing, ever-advancing wave of Irelands progress. In this same hasty, gossipy way I had intended to note the most famous books, pictures, and statuary of the half-century, together with the metropolitan and provincial town improvements and extensions. And I had also intended to chatter awhile of distinguished living people--in short to do much that is still undone, and made room for many things within my view which I am at present compelled to omit. A. PAGE. Acad emy, Royal, Attacks on the, by Mr. J. Hume 88 . ini837, 84 Accession Year, Events of the 64 Actors, Lives of 133 Adalbert of Prussia,...
